

In a remote area of the countryside, in the great plains of the U.S.A., a baby was placed on the floor to crawl free around the living room of a small house. He would crawl over the top of anything in the way, and if he ran into an immovable object, he would press on against it, as if to think he could move it, or crawl through it. He was nicknamed Tank because he would not stop moving forward despite running into tables, chairs, or anything in his way. Sometimes the race is won not by the one who runs the fastest, but by the one who keeps on running. Many years later that child won the World Championships in Taekwon-Do not because he had any innate talent or ability, but simply because he would not give up trying. The author is International Taekwon-Do World Veteran Power Champion, European Patterns Champion, and has 25 years of international business experience in technology, but if you asked his teammates on the national Taekwon-Do squad about Richard, they would tell you that Richard is not really that good at patterns, and he really isn't that good of a practitioner of Taekwon-Do, relatively speaking. But, he is the world champion... So how did he Do It? Maybe it was lucky :O) Richard is the author of Do It, and also www.onlinesalestraining.co.uk which is a website focused on assessing and improving the abilities of technology sales professionals. While born in the USA, he has spent most of his working life living in Europe and working in the competitive business arena of computer technology. As an amateur sportsman Richard has been competing in sports at an international level and has numerous World and European Medals competing in the International Taekwon-Do Federation as a Veteran.
